Kevin's teaching career has spanned over 30 years and has found locations in the United States and Europe and has included working in primary, secondary and vocational education. Since 2003, Kevin has organized, lead teacher training programmes and held workshops for that learners noticing that they are able to absorb and learn languages through a much wider variety input than what is usually offered through traditional forms of language-instruction: rather than approaching text as disjointed from the content, it is the content that determines and constructs the message of a text. This has prompted Kevin to become increasingly more interested in CLIL, first becoming involved in teacher-training programmes in Eichstaat Germany, sharing his belief that the development of language-based skills can only come through an interdisciplinary approach where content provides the motivation for meaning-making. This is the type of belief he has taking into his teacher training and the development of language-learning materials and methods for upper primary and secondary education. the European Platform in CLIL
